MAKING THE CALENDAR.

the year.

Although two new months had been added—January and February—the year was not long enough yet. Numa made his months to correspond to the revolutions of the moon, which made 351 days, or fifteen days short of the number required by the earth to make its annual journey around the sun. So on alternate years they would change the number of days in February until the days and months came out pretty nearly even. By and by this custom was abused by the politicians.

The calendar was in charge of the pontiffs, and if they wanted to keep a friend in office they could lengthen this month as they pleased, or if they wanted to hold elections before their enemies were ready, they would curtail the month and catch their opponents napping. It was a fine game of politics.

After awhile matters became so badly mixed that in Julius Caesar's time the months were in the autumn and the autumn months in the summer and so on.

The year 46 B. C. is known to history as "The Year of Confusion." Caesar improvised two months of his own between November and December, just for this one year, giving it a length of 445 days.

This wonderful year canceled all previous errors, and when the question of how to make the succeeding years of equal length and to correspond to the annual revolution of the earth around the sun had to be solved, Caesar's attempt at its solution brought about the "leap year." Caesar did not consider the moon in his calculations, but made months of 30 and 31 days alternately, except February, which had 29 days in ordinary years and 30 days every 4th year. Because of his straightening out the calendar difficulties, and because he calculated to within a fraction of a day in each year, Caesar was deemed worthy of a lasting memorial. In his honor Quintilis was changed to Julius, or as we call it, July.

His successor, Augustus Caesar, the first of the Roman Emperors, had a month named for him, too. The name Sextilis was changed to August, after Augustus. It so happened that this month had only 30 days, whereas that named for Julius had 31. Augustus could not allow this, so he had an extra day tacked on to August, and poor February was the loser.

Thereafter February had 28 days in ordinary years, and 29 in leap years.

If the earth took exactly 365 days and 6 hours to perform its annual journey around the sun, the Julian Calendar would have been perfect in every respect. But the revolution is completed in eleven minutes and ten seconds less than the 365 days and 6 hours—the time being actually exactly 365 days, 5 hours, 49 minutes and 49 seconds.

This slight error might have been corrected at once by a reduction in the number of leap years.

But the error was allowed to grow, so that by 1582 A. D., the discrepancy amounted to ten days. In that year, Pope Gregory decreed that the 5th of October should be the 15th, thus cancelling the error of the past. The correction was not adopted by all the countries at once, but gave rise to what is known as the New Style. In those countries which did adopt it, until this year, Russia held to the Old Style, and in some places in Great Britain the terms Old and New Style both are used.

Having corrected the error of the past, Pope Gregory endeavored to prevent its recurrence in the future. He found that the error was equivalent to an excess of 3 days in 400 years; so he decreed that of the last years of the century only those which are divisible by 400 are leap years. According to the Julian Calendar, the last year of each century would be a leap year, and as according to his reckoning, every 400 years have 3 days more than enough to complete 400 journeys around the sun, so by omitting three of these extra days in every 400 years, the mistake could be rectified. The year 1600 was a leap year; 1700, 1800 and 1900 were not leap years. The year 2000 will be a leap year. As the Russians who so lately adopted the New Style or Gregorian calendar observed 1700, 1800 and 1900 as leap years, they had three days additional added to the original error.

Our year is now exactly as it was after Gregory had corrected it. Even after his correction, however, there remains a slight mistake, but it is so small that it will amount to only a day in three thousand, nine hundred years. The error is one of excess, so it is proposed to make the year 4000—otherwise a leap year—a common year.

After that the calculations are so minute that the length of the year will so exactly correspond to the earth's revolution around the sun that they will not differ more than a day in one hundred thousand years.
